El estallido de la Guerra Civil Española provocó la polarización de la sociedad mexicana en torno al conflicto español. Si los grupos más conservadores simpatizaron abiertamente con la sublevación militar que había tenido lugar en España, el régimen cardenista y los sectores sociales que le respaldaban se alinearon desde un principio con la causa de la República española. El gobierno de Lázaro Cárdenas no sólo suministró a las autoridades republicanas armas y municiones procedentes de sus propios arsenales, sino que sirvió de intermediario para las compras de armamento en terceros países por parte de una República cada vez más acorralada y, a la postre, abrió las puertas del país al exilio de miles de republicanos españoles. Sin embargo, el principal apoyo de México a la República española tuvo lugar en el marco de la Sociedad de Naciones, donde los sucesivos representantes mexicanos denunciaron reiteradamente y casi en solitario la intervención de las potencias fascistas en España, al tiempo que ponían de manifiesto la inoperancia de la política de no intervención. La defensa de la causa republicana en Ginebra no sólo constituiría una de las páginas más brillantes de la historia de la diplomacia mexicana, sino que sentaría algunos de los principios rectores de la política exterior de México durante las siguientes décadas.
